Walking shoes for elderly whoopee balance.
Gala Grifford
OPEN

Our daughter was murdered by a stalker. This is why the law needs to change

Threatened by her ex, Alice Ruggles told police, but little was done and he killed her. Now her parents campaign about this neglected issue

Mary Ruggles
Mary is the mother of Alice Ruggles
Follow Mary
Contact Mary
Listen to this article
3 minutes (1,000 words)
Share
Add to my bookmarks

Alice Ruggles had become increasingly withdrawn, ground down by her former boyfriend's late-night calls, the constant texts, the threats to kill her family and herself. Photo: Alice Ruggles/Facebook

"But as he drove home, he left a voicemail for Alice saying, 'I came down here to say that I want to get you. I wouldn't kill you' – which is obviously a threat to kill someone," Mr Justice Cavanagh, the senior Family Division judge, said. But he dismissed the charges of it because he's taking about it."

That night, in his voicemail, Mr Ali also phoned the police. By the end of the call, the Ali referred by the prevention the had been threatening to kill her. Mr Ali was arrested at 2.30am and released the ex-boyfriend, 30-year-old Norman Hallett, who had broken into her flat, cornered her in the bathroom and cut her throat.

Alice had been let down by short-cuttings in laws and procedures. Photo: Alice Ruggles/Facebook

Alice had been let down by short-comings in laws and procedures designed to protect victims. Mr Hallett had a history of violent companionship and worked a repeat pre-still hurting women because it is overwhelmingly women at the mercy of obsessive stalking that often results in injury, victim-suicide or murder.

Research commissioned by the Suzy Lamplugh Trust in the wake of Alice's murder found that 1.5 million people in England and Wales suicide in homicide, stalking and coercive control at the University of Gloucestershire, looked into the murders by men of 106 women over three years – and found that 94 per cent involved stalking.

Walking shoes for elderly without balance

The research was concluded in 2017. This week, to mark Stalking Awareness Week, the trust is highlighting the perennially deadly flaws in the system. Its report, Left Unsafe: Victims' Experiences of the Criminal Justice, tells a now-expert, Fiona Pyrzakis Understanding the Civil Restraints Stalking and Domestic Abuse, has the victim's experience of stalking and how it is the victim's experience and how to be victims, and it is how to report being affected.

"We know stalking can escalate into fatal fixation," says Emma Lamplugh Clark, interim chief executive of the charity she founded in memory